Recycled Concrete Aggregates

It is common practice in the US to crush old concrete pavements at the end of their service lives into recycled concrete aggregate and then reuse them in the base course of new pavements. It is not, however, common to use the recycled concrete aggregate (RCA) in the new concrete pavement itself. Dr. Wilde will present results of a research project funded by the Minnesota Department of Transportation that examines the economics of using recycled concrete aggregate in the construction of new concrete pavements. In addition to a laboratory study of the properties of concrete made with RCA, a study was conducted to compare the long-term performance of pavements made with and without RCA in Minnesota in the mid-1980s.
